The instrument referred to above was made by the Cambridge Scientific Instrument Company, Limited. From the above series of readings the specimen in the furnace would be said to have been heated to 605 C. Preliminary Examination of the Material in the State as supplied. The elastic properties of the materials to be employed were examined not only in the usual fashion by breaking a specimen in the testing machine, and recording the breaking load and the ultimate elongation, but also in a manner which has already been described in a paper by the present author on the recovery of iron from overstrain. Diagram NO. 1 of the present paper illustrates this method of examination, the material examined being a rod of steel rather under half an inch in diameter., A specimen about a foot long was cut from this rod, and was turned down in the centre for a length of 5 inches to a diameter just over that of an inch. Sufficient length was left unturned at each end to enable the specimen to be securely gripped in the jaws of the testing machine. The diameter of the turned portion of the specimen was then accurately measured; a 4-inch length was marked off by means of a marking instrument of Professor Ewing's design; the extensometer was attached to this 4-inch length, the specimen was put into the testing machine, and load was applied. Extensometer readings were...
