We have gone fast and far. Without intent to blame anyone and with due appreciation of the fact that much which has happened was inevitable; still, there are those who would have liked it had less centralization of power been deemed necessary and had greater distribution of government management been made among the political parties. Perhaps something in the way of a coalition cabinet would have satisfied many of us and would have put to sleep the feeling that extreme power, once secured, was meant to be retained. It would be idle to try to disguise the dissatisfaction of many of us at the turn of various events. We simply endured and waited for the time to come when we might, with propriety, comment without fear of injuring a greater cause while championing a lesser. But convictions, unsatisfied, did not die even if...
